Going Back to the Future—Creating Interprofessional Education and Collaborative Practice Opportunities at all Levels of Nursing Education

High quality patient care is best delivered by healthcare practitioners who effectively communicate and utilize the “team decision making approach” to solve patient/client/person care issues. The literature describes how team-based interprofessional care directly correlates to the provision of safe quality care. It is this validation that has led to accrediting agencies now requiring that schools educate and engage in interprofessional education and collaborative practice initiatives. Nurses are central to the delivery of care and nursing students must be prepared to engage in team-based, collaborative leadership approaches. Interprofessional education requires clinical practice with many healthcare and social service disciplines. At the conclusion of this session participants will have developed an interprofessional and/or collaborative practice learning activity and evaluation plan for the students in their respective program.

Speaker: Elizabeth Speakman, EdD, RN, ANEF, FNAP, Co-Director of the Jefferson Interprofessional Education Center, Thomas Jefferson University School of Nursing, Philadelphia, PA
